My dear Lucien Moreau,

Your letter of the third reached me yesterday, borne by the long road and, I fancy, the longer thoughts of you. I read it twice beneath the linden, and once more aloud to little Clara, who asked whether you would visit when the river frees itself of ice. If duty permits, come in late July, for the town will need a steady mind when the mill question comes before the council.

I have enclosed the notes you requested concerning the school accounts and the subscription list. Forgive the untidy sums; the ink blots as freely as the boys and I contend with both. Mother's health is unchanged, though the warm weather eases her cough.

The linden's shade keeps the town's many tongues in one patient circle.

Write when you can, even if only a few lines. They are more to me than you may guess.

Yours ever,
Elinor Vale

P.S. I have sent with this M. Lefebvre's article from the Gazette. You will like his argument, though I do not confess to all his conclusions.
